HVAC System Design

Attn: Ken Cenatiempo

Ken,

Some questions have come about in regards to the HVAC system function and design. I hope this letter will address these with satisfactory answers.

The transfer fan and relief damper for the electrical/telephone room may be removed from the design drawings. These items were added after the original design and are not required. The intent was that a line voltage thermostat would bring on the transfer fan to use the air from the return air plenum to keep the electrical room from rising to an extreme temperature. This area is not considered an occupied room and does not need to be conditioned.

The supply and return grilles in the elevator lobby may also be deleted. They were also added to the design by your request. This area is considered much in the same way as that of a foyer or corridor. This space is an area between the service area (sales offices) and the entrance to the building (elevator). This is not a waiting or reception area and will not be occupied other than to pass through the area when leaving or entering the elevator. Conditioning of this area for occupancy is not necessary.
