Dear Gregg,

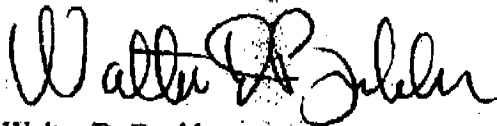

Please refer to Building Inspection comments dated 6/25/01 pertaining to the drainage rock under the proposed new exterior foundations. Also see enclosed sketch.

The vertical load of the building is primarily supported by the 2'-0" x 2'-8" underpinning. Altho the new poured in place wall shown on Section A/1 of the drawings does provide some vertical support, it is primarily for the resistance of lateral soil pressure. The drainage rock is essentially self compacting and will support the low pressures to which it will be subjected. The drainage line is near the heel of the footing where the pressure is only 350 psf. The higher pressure of 960 psf shown in the calculations is at the toe of the footing.

It is my opinion that the current location of the drainage pipe and drainage rock will not adversely effect the ability of the new footing to adequately support the load to which it will be subjected.

Please call if you have any questions.

Very truly yours,

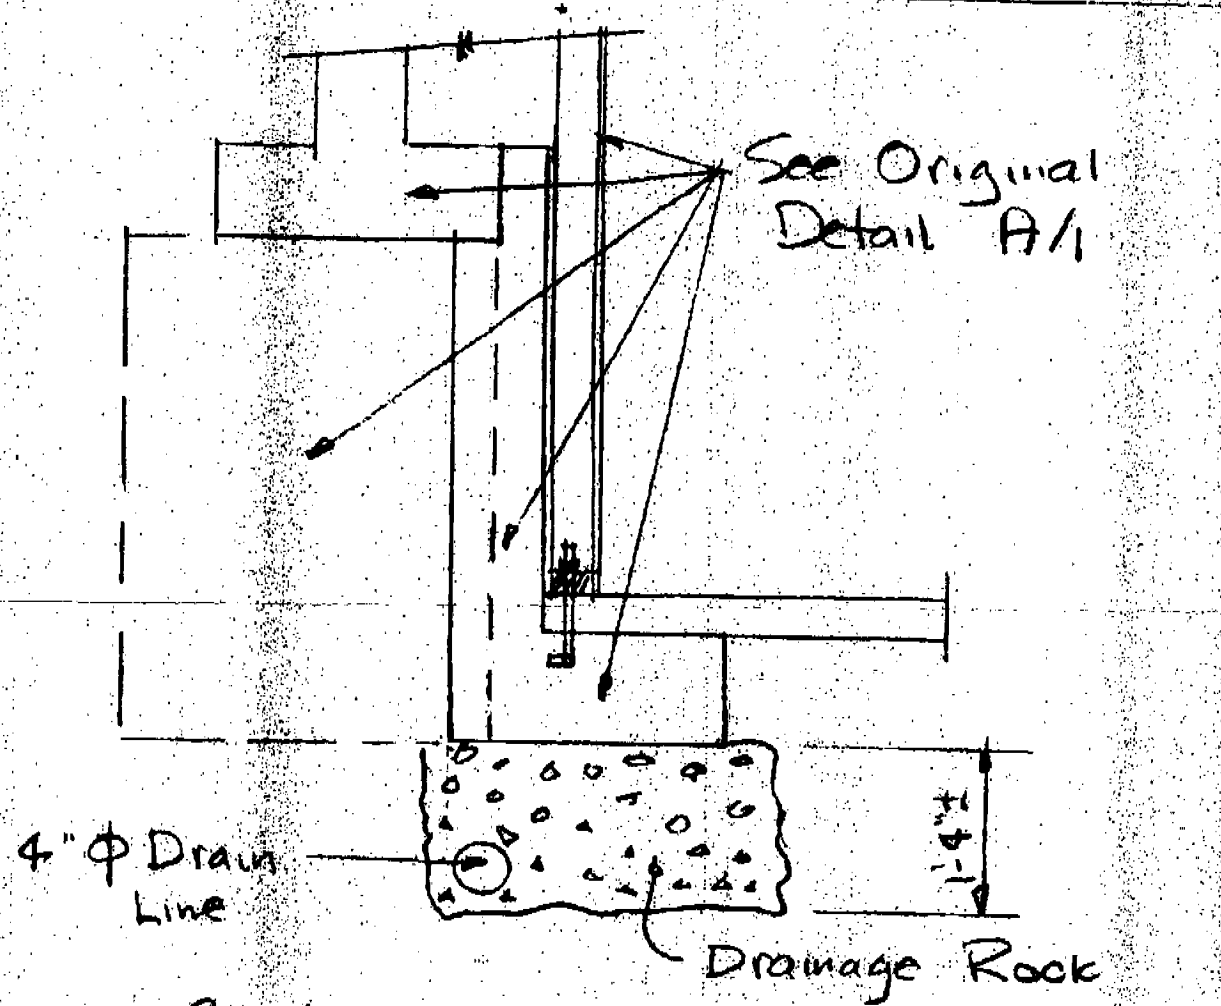

Walter D. Buehler
